about the artwork in the terrace café

Hunt Slonem

(American, b. 1951)

Bunny Wall

2012–16

oil on wood

Gift of Henry and Pat Shane

2020.169–195

Each day, before his first cup of coffee, New York artist Hunt Slonem paints a series of colorful and calligraphic bunny portraits that flow quickly from his memory and imagination through his brush and onto the canvas. Some have droopy ears, others have ears that stand at attention and bushy whiskers. Set within an old salvaged frame, each has a unique personality and are a nod to Slonem's Post-Expressionistic and Pop Art style and his love of history and antiques.

Slonem's practice of "warm-up paintings," as he calls them, was inspired by Abstract Expressionist painter Hans Hoffmann (1880–1966) who created several small abstract paintings each morning in preparation for tackling larger projects. After learning that he was born in the Chinese zodiac's Year of the Rabbit, Slonem decided to paint bunnies. Slonem kept rabbits as pets during his childhood and has always loved them for their dynamism and independence. He adds, "If you're going to paint multiples, it seems right to do it with rabbits." "
